THE CINCUENTINA

The first appearance of the large silver 50 real pieces in the reign of Philip III was a development less surprising to the people of the time than it may appear to the Collector of today. Called "cincuentines", these massive coins reflected economic, social and political forces operating in early 17th century Spain, many of which were not dissimilar from those with which we are now familiar.

It is, of course, obvious that to have any coinage at all requires an adequate and continuous supply of the precious metals. The painfully small, thin and frequently debased deniers of 11th and 12th century Europe tell their own story about the dearth of silver available for use as money. By the middle of the 15th century the picture had changed. New methods of separating silver from low grade ores, as well as more sophisticated techniques for draining underground works, enabled many old mines to be reopened profitably. At the same time new seams were discovered in the Austrian Tirol, the Harz mountains and in Saxony. As a result there was a five fold increase in the production of silver between 1450 and 1530.

The numismatic effects of the new availability of large supplies of silver were almost immediate. In 1486 the Archduke Maximilian's mint at Hall began striking "guldengroschen", dollar sized coins of the same value as gold gulden. His example was soon followed by Frederick the Wise of Saxony in 1500. In 1519 the Counts Schlick, lords of Joachimsthal in Bohemia, opened their own mint and struck the large pieces called "Joachimstalers", a term soon shortened to taler, and translated into English as dollar. Later in the century the Dukes of Brunswick, who controlled the rich Harz mines, struck multiple talers in denominations as high as the 10 taler piece.

The concept of a very large coin was, then, quite familiar when the next vast increase in supply of silver became available. In 1597 at the end of the reign of Philip II, the most powerful monarch in Europe, the Spanish imports of silver from Mexico and Peru reached a peak, and were maintained at very high annual average for the next thirty years. At the same time the internal conditions in Spain had begun to deteriorate. Much of the precious metal which poured into the royal coffers was already pledged for debts and expenses associated with the continual wars entered into by Spain in defense of her sprawling empire, and for less substantial reasons of maintaining what she thought was the prestige due her dignity as the world's greatest power. At the same time economic conditions at home were chaotic, there was high unemployment, inflation was rampant, and the circulating medium was reduced to base minor coins.

Against this background, it was decided to strike the "cincuentines" at the Segovia mint, in 1613, 1617 and 1618. Similar pieces were produced in the two following reigns, as much out of force of habit as anything else, although those of Philip III, struck when there was a larger supply of American silver available, are much the rarer.

Spanish numismatists and historians have been able to come up with no hard evidence to explain these coins, other than the general explanation given above. Heiss, in his authoritative, "MONEDAS HISPANO-CRISTIANAS" is reduced to saying, "Por su peso y su tamaño es mas que probable que se acunasen pocas para el comercio; estamos persuadidos de que mas fueron piezas de regalo o de ostentacion, que de uso general". With apologies for our printer's inability to render this quotation with the correct Spanish accents, we are inclined to agree that the splendid "cincuentines", the most magnificent Spanish silver coins ever struck, were intended for royal gifts rather than commercial use. In closing it should be noted that they were not really "struck" at all, but produced by roller dies, as many Imperial coins were during the same century.
